It sounds like you are describing a deep, collective "burnout" that many entrepreneurs feel. You've hit on a very painful truth: when a partnership breaks down without a system, it doesn't just take your money—it takes your peace of mind and your reputation.

Here is the English translation of your reflection:

Fed Up with Partnerships? You're Not Alone.

Have you ever reached a point where you are so exhausted by partnerships that you don't even want to hear the word "collaboration" anymore?

We see it all the time:

- Friends who become so bitter they can't even look at each other's faces.
- Businesses that were better off alone but began to shrink and fail after taking on partners.
- People who run away the moment they hear about a "great opportunity" because it involves a partnership.

The reason for this trauma is simple: we often fail to study the systematic procedures of how a partnership should actually function. In Myanmar, we have a habit of working based purely on "Trust." We skip the Written Agreements because we think they are unnecessary between friends.

Then, when the inevitable problems arise, people are forced to hire Business Lawyers who specialize in shareholder disputes just to settle the mess. By then, you are paying heavy service fees that could have been avoided—essentially paying a "penalty tax" for not having a contract in the first place.

The "Cost of Conflict" vs. The "Cost of Contract"

You’ve made an excellent point about the hidden costs. Most people avoid a lawyer at the beginning to "save money," but they end up paying ten times more to a lawyer at the end to "save their skin."

"A contract is not a sign of distrust; it is a roadmap for when human emotions inevitably change."

My Final Takeaway

You’ve perfectly summarized the cycle of "Emotional Business" vs. "Systematic Business." When we rely on Trust alone, we are vulnerable. When we rely on a System, we are protected.

Since you've seen so many people get "burned" by these experiences, do you believe the solution is for business owners to study basic Business Law themselves, or should they simply make it a mandatory rule to never sign a deal without a professional intermediary?
